

No to relaxing the State of Indiana's no-call list in any way.
It works right now, and it works right now because it serves the exact purpose it is intended to serve by the public. Relaxing this no-call to allow unsolicited calls from banks, retail stores, or any other business only compromises the spirit of the existing State of Indiana no-call as it currently exists.

I understand that offers of mortgages, credit cards, and other credit services require any mode possible to gain access to the consumer, but the consumer is not served by this type of unsolicited solicitation, and when a consumer holds a credit card from a retail store for instance the consumer does not intend to open themselves up to unsolicited approaches that do not on their own recede.

People working the phones on behalf of the soliciting business are paid VIA commissions of which they can only gain by selling the consumer the product. This is not illegal or overly annoying in its own right, as many people earn their livings by way of commission; however, when these extremely annoying calls come totally unsolicited, what is the difference between allowing this telephone solicitation and allowing strong arm solicitations on the sidewalk? If there is a difference, it is that one can go home to escape solicitations on the street or in a retail location, but one can not go home to escape the non-stop solicitations that come to our home phones. These calls interrupt our hearts, minds and souls while we struggle to make our own honest livings and raise our families.

No to the relaxing of the existing State of Indiana no-call policy and practices. It works! We are happy. Do not compromise that.
